I'm concerned that the draft plan does not go far enough to lower the toxicity of the Willamette River. There would be too much contaminated sediment left alone -- 1,876 acres. Less than 10% of the contaminated sediment would be treated.

Like many middle-class Oregonians, there is no way I would gamble on eating the fish from the Willamette. Nothing in the current plan would dissuade me from that. However, lots of people don't have the choice that I do. The current plan ensures that the impact would continue to fall disproportionately on the poorer communities that rely on the Willamette.

Finally, where is the accountability on the polluters? How can we move ahead from our history of polluting the river, when the corporations and companies that did most of the damage to the river aren't held financially accountable?

Please go back to the drawing board and come up with a better plan.
